It would be unfair, however, to assume that the exceptionally small amounts of ammonia found in some of the samples indicated exceptional freedom from sewage. Such a conclusion would be in opposition to all evidence collected from other quarters. Considering this matter as a whole, it probably is best to take no account of the determinations of ammonia made in 1907, since it is practically certain that they were inaccurate. 3-CHLORINE IN THE WATER (a) Value of Results.--Taken separately, or in connection with the results of previous analyses of the New York Bay Pollution Commission, the chlorine analyses made for the Metropolitan Sewerage Commission constitute a fairly large mass of data, and throw important light upon the admixture of sea water and river water in the harbor and its various tributaries. The difference in salinity at points more or less removed from the ocean is clearly shown by the data; as is the smaller amount of chlorine, or, as may be said, sea water, on ebb tide than on flood tide. Several series of samples collected at different depths and at different points show that the saltiest water generally lies at the greatest depth. There were 802 samples of water analyzed for chlorine in 1907. Until a certain date the samples were collected at the same time as, though they were not identical with, the samples collected for analysis for bacteria. After that date determinations of chlorine were omitted. The...
