Excerpt: . . . taken away by repeated scrapings. It is largely to obviate this that the sand-layer is made several feet thick at first, for the bacteria-separating efficiency may be equally good or nearly so if even less than a foot of fine sand be present, yet the brief increase in the number of bacteria, with the effluent which comes just after cleansing of the surface, is greater in shallow than in deep filters, probably because of mechanical disturbance of the bed in its deeper parts. The majority of experts think five-foot layers of sand yield better results than very thin beds. After being cleaned and leveled, the filter-beds should have some of the purified water returned through the outflow pipe until the surface of the sand is just covered. Then crude water is gently introduced, through the regular supply-pipe, until the ordinary working height of three...
